

Bloomberg Businessweek Contents

October 25 — October 31, 2010
Bloomberg Businessweek

Dollar menu
Why McDonald's is a tasty bet for investors p110

Opening Remarks

8

Researchers have found that Americans think the U.S. has far more income equality than it has—and want it to be even fairer. How to make that happen? That's where it all breaks down

Global Economics

13

Amber waves of exports
With foreign demand for U.S. grain rising fast, farmers are flush—and they're spending

North Korea's won woes p14
Like it or not, the West depends on immigrant workers p15
Tom Keene's EconoChat p15
China takes on inflation p18
A tighter grip on Africa's oil p18
Seven days ahead p19

Companies & Industries

20

Chatter matters
Demand grows for companies that sift through and decipher the talk on social media sites

A cultural shift in Caterpillar's supply chain p22
The sun isn't shining on green sports stadiums p24
With Kraft and General Mills in the game, Greek yogurt isn't a subculture anymore p26
Briefs p28

Politics & Policy

31

Alice Rivlin's end run
She hopes a group of budget hawks will help break a likely impasse on Obama's deficit panel

Mortal Kombat in the Supreme Court p34
The ties that bind Republican fundraising groups p34
Eight races to watch on Nov. 2, and why they're crucial p36
Charlie Rose/Robert Reich p40

Technology

43

Google's 2.4% solution
A complex structure allows companies to cut overseas taxes. No one in tech uses it better than Google

The for-profit, socially conscious social network p45
Silicon Valley legend John Doerr returns to the consumer Internet with a new fund p46
Developing a digital photo lens that captures everything p48

Markets & Finance

51

Big plans for Cantor
Howard Lutnick's ambition: Make the firm a full-service investment bank and take it public within two years

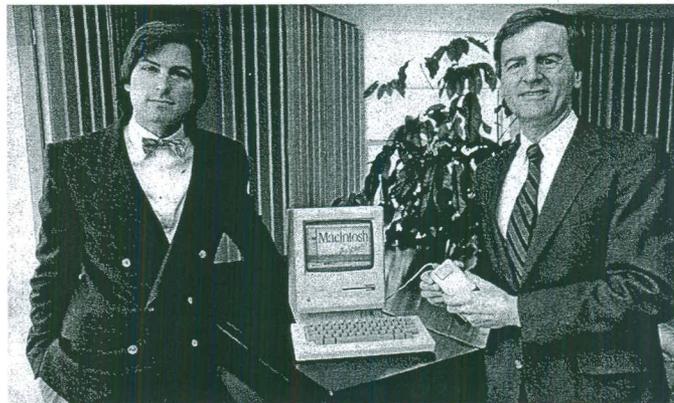

Why health and defense stocks are suffering p52
Vanguard's low fees help it take on the two leaders in ETFs p53
A shorter lunch break for Hong Kong traders? p54
Bid & Ask: The week's deals p56

Enterprise

59

Uncorking state cash
Government money pours into the wine industry even though most vineyards take years to turn a profit

Sweet-talking Wal-Mart p61
Chile woos foreign startups p64
A West Bank Oktoberfest p66
Tech's talent shortage p70
Big loan costs for small biz p72
Women founders, unite p72
The little lenders that could p74

Jobs was my co-pilot John Sculley, Steve's last boss, tells all

Features

76

Shredding the American Dream

The foreclosure crisis isn't just about lost documents. It's about trust—and a clash over who gets stuck with $1.1 trillion in losses p76

This Fish Shall Rule the World

Tilapia is cheap, grows fast, and is bland enough to go with everything. Environmentalists hate it, but Americans keep ordering more p88

Being Steve Jobs' Boss

In his first big interview on Apple, John Sculley talks about design, how his partnership with Jobs began, and why he should never have been CEO p96

Etc.

103

The Twitter Effect

Coining perfectly weird company names is big business. The race for the next Twitter is on

The Office Lab Reading body language in the Starbucks coffee queue p106
Television Reality show Pawn Stars may be the most revealing series of the era p108
Wealth Finding steady income with companies that return capital to shareholders p110
Hands On The Bose SoundLink streams your playlists wirelessly—for a hefty price p112
The Stack An inside look at the seedy business of youth basketball, where 10-year-old boys with NBA dreams make middle-aged moguls wealthy p113
Hard Choices Star litigator David Boies on choosing between his clients and his firm, and striking out on his own—at age 56 p116